The Convention on Cluster Munitions has groundbreaking victim assistance provisions. States must promote and protect the rights of cluster munition victims. They must ensure that victims have the same social and economic opportunities as everyone else in their communities. They must ensure victim assistance is available and accessible to all victims, even in remote communities.

If these obligations are properly implemented, they can significantly improve the lives and livelihoods of survivors, their families and communities. Cluster munition victims have always believed in the promise of this Convention. It is up to all of us to make sure these expectations are fulfilled. It can be done.
